

Fonts on the Front Page – a Study of Typefaces on the Front Pages of America’s Top Newspapers

Prepared by Bill Davis, Ascender® Corporation

Executive Summary

Ascender Corporation studied America’s top 100 daily newspapers to determine what fonts were used on their front pages. Newspapers use a mix of text and display typefaces in a wide variety of styles to communicate the news and to give each newspaper a unique look and personality. While there are more than 50,000 fonts available in the market today for designers to choose from, the study found that newspapers use a much smaller group to grace their front pages.

The study found that the 10 most popular typeface families are: Poynter™, Franklin Gothic, Helvetica™, Utopia™, Times™, Nimrod™, Century Old Style, Interstate™, Bureau Grotesque™ and Miller™. Many of these typefaces were designed specifically for newspapers – the letterforms include features for legibility that address the challenges of reproduction on newsprint.

Additionally the study found each of the top seven daily newspapers use typefaces specifically designed or commissioned on their behalf. Further, 35 of the top 100 daily newspapers use a custom typeface or modified font in addition to retail, off-the-shelf fonts. The use of custom fonts allows publications to strengthen their brand and give a distinct, exclusive quality to their publication.

The fonts used on the front pages in newspapers come from a variety of sources including large, established type foundries, smaller independent type foundries and individual type designers who specialize in custom newspaper fonts.

The Internet represents a new delivery vehicle for newspapers to reach their subscribers. But the jury is still out on the best approach to create electronic editions of newspapers in a manner that preserves the look & feel and the brand of the print edition. One approach is to embed the fonts into the electronic edition using PDF or similar software. While this helps capture the typographic look & feel, the exact fonts and layout used for newsprint reproduction and may not necessarily provide the best on-screen reading experience. The other approach is to use common HTML web design formatting. This allows users to view the page with standard web browsers with system fonts that may be much better for on-screen reading. But the unique design personality of the newspaper is lost with this approach.

Thus newspapers are at a significant intersection of design for two different mediums: print and electronic reading. Each medium has different font formats and technologies to create and render fonts with optimal legibility. Newspapers need to understand these font issues and make informed choices as they develop their strategies for print and electronic editions.

Note: the term “font” and “typeface” are used interchangeably in this study.

Background

Newspapers have a rich typographic history that has evolved with newspapers themselves. In Europe and America there were many type foundries that over the years had developed extensive libraries of metal and wood types that they would sell to printers and publishers. These types would be hand set to layout newspaper pages. Newspaper publishers would select typefaces that would provide the appearance desired for their particular readership.

The industrial revolution transformed many aspects of newspaper publishing and brought significant changes in newspaper typesetting and production methods. The introduction of mechanical typesetting systems at the turn of the 19th century replaced hand-set foundry types with the fonts supplied by the typesetting machine company (Linotype and Monotype being the two prominent companies). The initial fonts for these typesetting machines were initially adaptations of the common foundry types. Newspapers were forced to select their fonts based on the typefaces available for their particular typesetting system.

Many typefaces have been designed to address the printing conditions of newspapers, the most famous being Times New Roman®, first used by The Times of London in 1932. Times New Roman was designed for legibility and economy – durable yet readable. It was widely adapted and has become one of the most widely used typefaces of the past century.

In the 1960's another technological change began to impact newspaper design and production. Film and photo-based typesetting systems began to replace hot metal typesetting systems, and offset lithography began to replace letterpress printing presses. Again fonts had to be redesigned and adapted to deal with the peculiarities of these new technologies. And again every phototypesetting manufacturer developed proprietary techniques and formats for their fonts.

In the late 1980's the desktop publishing and computer revolution brought yet another wave of technology that would impact newspapers and newspaper typefaces as we know them today.

The introduction of Adobe® PostScript®, the Apple® Macintosh®, and subsequently the dominance of Microsoft Windows democratized the development of typefaces. No longer the proprietary domain of typesetting manufacturers, independent type designers and small digital type foundries have been responsible for the creation of important new fonts – many of which were created specifically for newspapers. The tools to create fonts are very affordable – but the knowledge to craft a successful type design remains a skill that requires extensive training and practice.

Newspapers can choose from thousands of typefaces from a wide range of sources, including individual type designers, small type foundries and large font software companies. The Internet has made selecting and purchasing fonts easier for both buyers and sellers: since font files are relatively small they can easily be downloaded. Most commercial fonts are licensed at a cost of $25 to $50 per font. The licensing terms vary by type designer/foundry as to the number of workstations and other uses (such as font embedding). Unfortunately font files are very easy to copy and share, thus piracy of font software is an issue for type designers.

Nowadays fonts are commonly available in two standard formats: Type 1 or TrueType®. A new font format, OpenType, is slowly gaining acceptance among publishers. OpenType can most easily be described as a combination of Type 1 and TrueType formats. OpenType fonts are supported by both Macintosh OS X and Windows® operating systems, but page layout applications popular with publishers, such as QuarkXPress®, have been slow to adapt this new format. OpenType has many advantages and is expected to make Type 1 fonts obsolete in the future.

There are three advantages OpenType has over Type 1: cross-platform support, Unicode for extended language support, and rich typographic options. Each of these is important to publishers. Unfortunately OpenType can be confusing in that it can contain font outlines in either the Type 1 or TrueType format. While Type 1 has long been the preferred format for publishers, TrueType offers advanced features for on-screen reading. Microsoft’s ClearType® technology is built into new versions of Windows to even further enhance the quality of type at small sizes on LCD displays. Thus an OpenType font could be hinted (programmed) to take advantage of ClearType if it contains TrueType outlines. This would benefit editors and writers on Windows-based computers and also readers of electronic editions using Windows-powered machines and devices.

Many newspapers commission custom typefaces as part of a redesign effort. The use of custom typefaces to capture a unique personality that reflects a publication is not new – custom types have been part and parcel with the history of type and printing. What is new is the proliferation of custom typefaces among a broader scope of magazine and newspaper publications around the world, and by multi-national companies as part of their corporate identity systems. Custom fonts provide organizations with the ability to express their brand in new ways and without being tethered by possible licensing restrictions of retail fonts. For newspapers, the front page represents a critical component of their brand – and the fonts used on the front page are key ingredients of the brand.

The introduction of electronic editions of newspapers presents a challenge to newspaper publishers: how to best leverage this new medium while preserving the brand represented by the look & feel of their printed edition. If a newspaper has custom fonts, how do they bring these into electronic editions? If a newspaper uses retail fonts are there any licensing restrictions that would prevent them from using the fonts in electronic editions?

Changes in font technologies and formats bring exciting opportunities to newspaper publishers to help them solve the challenges of readability on these different mediums. Ascender believes that newspapers need to fully explore the issues and options available as they develop their strategies for newspaper design, production and delivery of print and electronic editions.

About Ascender Corp

Ascender Corporation is a Chicago-based company specializing in multilingual, custom font development, licensing and typographic problem solving. The company’s founders have been involved in developing some of the most important and influential fonts in use today in computers, phones and printers. Ascender has a talented team with the expertise to solve complex font technology issues, the imagination to create font branding solutions, and the initiative to create value for our customers.

About this Study

Ascender is well-versed in the issues of type and typography at newspapers and other publications. We are also recognized experts in creating fonts for on-screen reading. Newspapers are evolving from the delivery of their publications not only on newsprint, but also in electronic editions. This junction of newspaper type for both print and on-screen reading inspired us to learn more about what fonts were currently being used at newspapers.

We had two options: obtain print versions of every newspaper and perform a visual analysis using our typographic knowledge or obtain electronic PDF versions and analyze the data to determine font usage. We chose to locate and analyze PDF files, as the PDF format allows for fonts to be embedded into the file, which we found to be a common practice in the publishing industry.

This study was conducted from Sept 30 to October 22, 2004 by investigating PDF versions of the top 100 daily newspapers of the USA posted on the Internet. We found the newseum.org website to be a perfect resource for this study. The Newseum is an interactive museum of news and is based in Arlington, Virginia. Every day a wide array of newspapers from around the world submit a copy of their front page to the Newseum, displayed in a section titled “Today’s Front Pages”. Every day the PDF file for each newspaper changes as new files are submitted by the papers.

We found that out of the 100 top daily newspapers in the USA, 85 submitted PDF files with embedded fonts. Ascender evaluated these 85 PDF files for font use, font names and font copyright information. Of the 15 newspapers in the top 100 that were not analyzed, either they did not participate in the Newseum’s Today’s Front Pages program, or the PDF files that were posted did not contain embedded fonts (because the PDF file was created from a scanned image). Sam Berlow of The Font Bureau provided font information on 12 of these 15 newspapers for our analysis, thus there were only 3 newspapers out of the top 100 daily newspapers that had no font data available for this study.

Over 1350 fonts were identified in the 97 newspapers, averaging out to 14 unique fonts on each front page. These fonts typically fall into the following categories: Display Fonts, Text Fonts and Symbol Fonts (barcodes, Pi, logos, icons, etc.). Our study did not attempt to discern the breakdown of these categories. Neither did we attempt to investigate pages and sections other than the front page. Rather we believed the identification of typeface families and their sources would be more informative. Thus we evaluated the font usage to determine the most popular typefaces and sources of these fonts. Our analysis also revealed extensive use of custom fonts or retail fonts with modifications. We have summarized these findings in charts and explanations on the following pages.

The analysis of PDF files revealed that Helvetica, Times and Zapf Dingbats were among the top five typefaces. This is not surprising as these fonts are standard on Macintosh/PC systems with Adobe Type Manager and in Adobe Acrobat. Helvetica or Times appear as the default font in many publishing software packages, so it can appear on a page that has an empty text box. In our review of the PDF files we found half of the occurrences of Helvetica and Times to fall into this category. Zapf Dingbats and other Pi and Bar Code fonts feature graphics or icons that are used on many newspaper front pages.

Thus if use of these system fonts are factored in, we would rank the 10 most popular typeface families as follows: 1. Poynter Series, 2. Franklin Gothic, 3. Helvetica, 4. Utopia, 5. Times, 6. Nimrod, 7. Century Old Style, 8. Interstate, 9. Bureau Grotesque, 10. Miller.

The Font Bureau is a Boston-based type foundry specializing in fonts for newspaper and magazine publishers. They have developed a wide range of typefaces specifically for various publishing clients, and thus their fonts have proven to be very popular with newspaper designers. In addition the Font Bureau collaborated with the Poynter Institute, a journalism school based in St. Petersburg, Florida, in the development of The Poynter Fonts – a series of typefaces with modern readability characteristics for display, text and agate listings.

The Adobe Type Library has become one of the most used resources in the publishing, design and advertising markets. A lot has to do with Adobe’s position as the inventor of PostScript. It built the Adobe Type Library by licensing fonts from the most important and influential type foundries including Linotype, ITC, Monotype, Bauer and many others. In the analysis of the PDF files we segregated fonts from these particular type foundries from the Adobe Original fonts. Utopia and Minion are two Adobe Originals designed by Robert Slimbach identified among the most popular newspaper fonts.

Bitstream was one of the first independent digital type foundries. Its original founders and type designers went on to form Carter & Cone and The Font Bureau.

Autologic was a typesetting company that specialized on newspapers.

Carter & Cone, Hoefler & Frere-Jones and the Shinn Type Foundry are small type foundries who, along with independent type designers Jim Parkinson, Gerard Unger and Christian Schwartz specialize in custom fonts for clients such as newspapers. Custom fonts produced for clients may eventually become retail fonts available for licensing after a period of exclusivity expires with the original client. This is a common practice with The Font Bureau, Carter & Cone, Hoefler and others.

Each of the top 7 newspapers analyzed used custom fonts produced for them by leading type designers and foundries. But custom fonts are not just the domain of the leading papers, as medium to large circulation newspapers also were found to use custom fonts.

Also noted were modified versions of retail fonts, where a newspaper customized an existing font in some manner. Modifications could vary from renaming an existing font to format conversions or even more extensive work.

The Font Bureau was the leading source for custom fonts, followed by Carter & Cone, Jim Parkinson, Gerard Unger and Christian Schwartz.

Custom fonts are popular with a wide range of publications because they bestow a distinct personality and familiarity to its readers.
